Austerity and mental health

By Diana Cormack

East Finchley station was the penultimate meeting point for Walk the Talk 2015, the aim of which was 'to raise awareness of social policies that are leading to psychological distress'.

From 17 – 21 August psychologists, counsellors and clients walked 100 miles from the British Psychological Society's office in Leicester to their London HQ, with some sleeping rough overnight or camping out in fields. On the way they visited centres connected with homelessness, food poverty and affected by the benefits system.

Organiser Stephen Weatherhead, a clinical psychologist, told The Archer that all in all 62 people had taken part, with others joining en route from different points. Another 25 joined at East Finchley including four from EFAB's weekly Talkie-Walkies group.

Happy to be here

In it over 10,000 Londoners were asked about their lives, and how they rated their neighbourhoods.

The saddest area in the capital was Dagenham, the most stressed was East Ham, the best for families was said to be Twickenham and the most drunk were people in Clapton.
